

NATURAL RESOURCES ARE CULTURAL RESOURCES

ENR restores degraded habitat conditions to assure a healthy life cycle for fish and wildlife species through:

- Noxious weed removal and management
- Reestablishment of culturally significant native plants
- Intentional debris placement to create channel complexity so fish can seek protection, cool water, and food
- Removal of fish passage barriers to ensure they can return to their natural habitat

These methods are implemented to improve water quality, polluted storm water runoff, and native plant landscaping. ENR attains these goals by collaborating with community members, schools, and local, regional, and state organizations and governmental agencies.

Many projects are dependent on community volunteers during which ENR provides opportunities for community involvement, public education, and instilling a sense of stewardship.

TRADITIONAL TRIBAL LANDS

WHO WE ARE

The Snoqualmie Indian Tribe has been in the Pacific Northwest since time immemorial. Long before roads and cars existed, we lived along the rivers and lakes utilizing them as highways to travel from village to village. We hunted deer and elk, fished for salmon, and gathered berries and wild plants for food and medicine. We are still here, active in the community, and caring for the fish, game, trees, and roots that are provided to live.

The Environmental and Natural Resources (ENR) Department was established in 2001 to protect, preserve, and enhance these natural and cultural resources for the benefit of current and future generations. ENR fulfills this mission through:

- Habitat restoration and water quality improvement projects
- Waste reduction and recycling
- Monitoring the impacts of regional policies and projects
- Education through stewardship
